Ember & Air

Ember & Air is an example company: a heat pump installer with about 40 people and three crews. Every question is a lead worth thousands, and the know-how sits in a few senior heads. Five people take part: a customer, a junior who answers, a senior who checks and teaches, the speaking coach (with Will, the AI coach), and the owner.

One card before sending

One card: the answer, the one moment Will picked, one big button. The button follows the risk: in a junior's first month, on a red flag, or when the answer promises something, it is Send when Piotr 👍, and his 👍 sends it by itself; otherwise it is Send. Try that line again re-records only the 5 seconds Will marked (the recording screens are locked: this needs the founder's OK).

The loop: spot the right moment, then give the one piece of feedback with the most leverage. The junior sees one line; this is what Will read to choose it:

· The chat: a customer, new, from the website.

· The stakes: a first answer to a money question, the grant.

· Josh's last Takes: he rushes the words that matter most.

· His plan this week: pace.

So, one moment (the grant, at 0:12) and one intervention, before he sends: a single line. Will judges how it is said, never what is advised; that is the senior's job.

After: Mark's reply, or his booking, tells Will whether it worked.

One card before sending

One card: the answer, the one moment Will picked, one big button. The button follows the risk: in a junior's first month, on a red flag, or when the answer promises something, it is Send when Piotr 👍, and his 👍 sends it by itself; otherwise it is Send. Try that line again re-records only the 5 seconds Will marked (the recording screens are locked: this needs the founder's OK).

The loop: spot the right moment, then give the one piece of feedback with the most leverage. The junior sees one line; this is what Will read to choose it:

· The chat: a customer, new, from the website.

· The stakes: a first answer to a money question, the grant.

· Josh's last Takes: he rushes the words that matter most.

· His plan this week: pace.

So, one moment (the grant, at 0:12) and one intervention, before he sends: a single line. Will judges how it is said, never what is advised; that is the senior's job.

After: Mark's reply, or his booking, tells Will whether it worked.
